Fashion Photography

Lillian Bassman had worked as a Fashion Photographer from the 1940's to the 1960's for Junior Drape and later worked at Harper's Bazaar where she had promoted the careers of photographers such as Richard Avedon, Robert Frank, Louis Feraud and Arnold Newman, among other photographers of the fashion magazine. Alfred Brodovitch, Bassman began to photograph her model subjects mostly in black and white. She published most of her art work in Harper's Bazaar from 1950 to 1965.

Digital Technology and Abstract Color Photography

In the 1970s, Lillian Bassman had lost interest in the fashion photography. She decided to completely abandon her work with fashion photography and decided to start over, and begin her own photographic projects by doing this, she practically found 40 years of negatives and prints to the side. Mostly her first work, Bassman's fashion photographic work began to be reappreciated in the 1990s.

She worked with digital technology and abstract color photography into the 90s to create a new series of work. She used technology for her image manipulation. The most notable quality about her photographic work are the high contrast between light and dark, the playfulness of the finished photos, and the geometric placement and camera angles of the subjects. Lillian Bassman became one of the last great woman photographers in the world of fashion.
